

Big tusks, big business

Elephants are an endangered species, and any renewal of culling policies can revitalize the ivory trade and jeopardize their survival. In the last 35 years, over 1 million elephants have been hunted.

South Africa has tried to overturn the global ivory trade ban for years and is now covertly trying to restart this industry by other means. Culling will be the first step.

Japan is one of the main buyers of ivory, where a kilogram is sold for 80 Euro.

The deep emotional, psychological and social lives of elephants, including their feelings of altruism, friendship and close family ties, aggression and fear, are scientific facts that cannot be ignored.

They also mourn their dead, often returning to a body and repeatedly touching it. When an elephant is shot, there is immediate distress on the part of the family and this trauma lasts over a long period of time.

"National parks should be safe havens for elephants—not killing fields."

Voice your opinion against the lift of the ban which puts the elephants on death row. Send an email to South Africa's Minister of Environmental Affairs :

Mr. Marthinus Van Schalkwyk
ministry@deat.gov.za
Fax: +27 (0)21 465 3216

Or Send a letter to:

Minister Marthinus Van Schalkwyk
Private Bag X9154
Cape Town
8000
South Africa

What you can do

Animal Rights Africa

<http://www.animalrightsafrica.org>

info@animalrightsafrica.org

Big tusks, big business

Elephants are an endangered species, and any renewal of culling policies can revitalize the ivory trade and jeopardize their survival. In the last 35 years, over 1 million elephants have been hunted.

South Africa has tried to overturn the global ivory trade ban for years and is now covertly trying to restart this industry by other means. Culling will be the first step.

Japan is one of the main buyers of ivory, where a kilogram is sold for 80 Euro.

The deep emotional, psychological and social lives of elephants, including their feelings of altruism, friendship and close family ties, aggression and fear, are scientific facts that cannot be ignored.

They also mourn their dead, often returning to a body and repeatedly touching it. When an elephant is shot, there is immediate distress on the part of the family and this trauma lasts over a long period of time.

"National parks should be safe havens for elephants—not killing fields."

Voice your opinion against the lift of the ban which puts the elephants on death row. Send an email to South Africa's Minister of Environmental Affairs :

Mr. Marthinus Van Schalkwyk
ministry@deat.gov.za
Fax: +27 (0)21 465 3216

Or Send a letter to:

Minister Marthinus Van Schalkwyk
Private Bag X9154
Cape Town
8000
South Africa

What you can do

Animal Rights Africa

<http://www.animalrightsafrica.org>

info@animalrightsafrica.org